★ Foreign policy realists are increasingly concerned about an apparent liberal effort to undermine the appointment to the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency of David Sullivan, a highly qualified expert on strategic arms limitation agreements and potential Soviet SALT violations. A former CIA officer, Sullivan made a splash two-and-one-half years ago when he furnished classified information on SALT to an aide of Sen. Henry Jackson's (D-Wash.). Sullivan, however, broke no law, and was fully and properly approved for top secret and higher security clearances six times by the Carter Administration since he voluntarily resigned from the CIA at that time. The Reagan Administration has reaffirmed the clearances, but he is still the target of dovish political types. "But Sullivan's expertise is needed," says one Senate staffer, "in order to keep the Soviets in line on SALT."
